Autism spectrum disorders (ASD) are a group of genetically heterogeneous neurodevelopmental disorders characterized by social and communication deficits, alongside repetitive, stereotypical patterns of behaviour. Mutations in a considerable number of ASD associated genes, including SHANK3 and STXBP1, have been reported in individuals with autism in previous research. Despite this, most of the literature on ASD is dominated by studies of individuals of European ancestry. It is not yet known whether the aetiology of ASD is similar in other populations. Here we describe a large Chinese family of northern origin, in which de novo mutations in STXBP1 account for the disorder in four members. The enrichment of de novo point mutations in STXBP1 is a novel finding, but it is not the only one reported to date. A minor allele frequency of the SNP reported here (rs2215851, c.619A > G, p.W207G) and variation (rs2217887, c.669T > G, p.Y223D) in genes implicated in autism risk will be described in the context of the pedigree reported. The novel nonsense mutation in NBEAL2 (rs2032142, c.289C > T, p.Q97X) found in this family will also be reported and used as a control for the de novo mutation analysis.
