Lately I have been using Firefox for Internet stuff, but I need to access various Linux program files too. I'm still using Firefox. The problem is that Linux installations also start out with Firefox. So my solution was to copy Firefox as a user, restarted the computer, logged in to Firefox, and then launched the programs and opened their associated files in Firefox. It wasn't a complete solution. Fortunately, with the release of Firefox 11, Firefox is now available as a package in the Ubuntu repositories. I think Ubuntu Precise users are better served by using the official Firefox 11, since Precise users have Firefox 10 installed by default. Grab Firefox 11 for Ubuntu Get Firefox 11 for Ubuntu Firefox 11 is in the archive: `sudo apt-get install firefox-11` NOTE: If you are running Ubuntu 12.04, you will be able to download the sources, configure and install Firefox 11 from Launchpad. Get the Firefox.deb file To install Firefox 11, you need to know where it is. It is in the archive: You need to use a web browser to download the .deb file, as the web server is behind a firewall. `sudo apt-get install` firefox-11.0+build2-0ubuntu0.12.04.1.deb You can use the Linux Archive Manager to extract the Firefox deb file: `sudo ar xvf

firefox-11.0+build2-0ubuntu0.12.04.1.deb` Now you have Firefox 11 installed. The next step is to log in to your Firefox session with your user account. To start
